THE ARAB'S HORSE.

In the desert the mares and foals and stallions stand day and night before their master, writes Major-Gen. Tweedle in an article on the Arabian horse. There are no grooms in our sense. Black slaves keep the ground clean, and the wives and daughters of the tent folk wives and daughters of the tent folk mares, drooping mare or a motherless foal is taken into the best part of the tent to be mared. In viliages the mared shed is close to the abilitation in which family life proceeds. The result is that food and fellowship are among the first ideas which are associated in the minds of Arab horses with the human figure. The mares turn as kindly to those around them as Gustavus did to Dugald Dalgetty. The youngling takes its cuefrom the dam, and is not afraid of that with which they are all familiar.

The colt which is handled by every one from the first, and ridden as soon as he is strong enough, is sure to prove docile and obedient. Even when full allowance is made for the advantages of early tuition, Arab men deserve some credit for the line temper of Arab horses. The most patient colt may have to resist as rider if either his anger he excited or too much of his own way be given to him.

A little incident which we lately witnessed in a crowded thoroughfare in Bagdad may here be worth introducing. An awkward groom had tumbled off the back of a playful filly, and left her free; carear hither and thither. Among the spectators there was mobody who blamed the filly. A red-bearded Fersian, whose bookstall was kicked into into the Tigris, had the sense to curse the biped and not the quadruped. When they con him out the fast a broker is a face looked and a ship's deck, and landed the filly. A red-bearded Fersian, whose bookstall was kicked into into the Tigris, had the sense to curse the biped and not the quadruped. When they con him out the quadruped when here rope was put into the groom's fill weeter."

The colt which we also do the same the way of cyclones. This into the groom had turneled off the back of a playful filly, and left her free care in ther and thither. Among the spectators there wa their master, writes Major-Gen. Tweedle in an article on the Arabian horse.
